Our Town 12/05/19

Originally published November 30, 2006

"Know what I found today?" Marcie said to the Soupster, as the two strode up the sidewalk on the Japonski Island side of the bridge.

"What?" asked the Soupster, on the rare recent day when it wasn't blisteringly cold. His chin down into his coat, the Soupster was enjoying the spread of warmth on his chest when he breathed. He wasn't really listening.

"3-D glasses!" Marcie said. "At the bottom of the pantry, beneath all the vole traps and old fishing net. Cardboard with cellophane lenses. One red and one blue lens. Must be fifty years old if a day!"

The Soupster uttered not a peep.

"Remember those old 3-D horror movies, like 'House of Wax?' asked Marcie. "Vincent Price?"

No response.

"'House of Wax' was the first major studio motion picture in 3-D," said Marcie. "And just about the last."

Still nothing.

"Although a lot of big actors, directors and producers got their start in horror films. Like Charles Bronson was in 'House of Wax.' Must've been his big break – at that time he was doing nothing but TV episodes. Played Igor in 'House of Wax,' under the name he also used when he did the TV stuff – Charles Buchinsky."

"Buchinsky," came the Soupster's voice, as though from the vast beyond. "Isn't Matt Dillon portraying him in some new movie?"

"That's Charles Bukowski. Bukowski was a

Beat writer from Los Angeles," Marcie said. "Soupster, are you all there today?"

"No, I'm listening," the Soupster lied. "3-D. I heard you. 3-D. Like my old Viewmaster."

"Say what?" said Marcie, so the Soupster added, "That may be before your time." The Soupster had a few years on Marcie.

"Kid's toy, looked like plastic binoculars?" prompted the Soupster, but Marcie shook her head.

"You put these round paper disks in the device -- the disks contained about a dozen pictures each," he continued to explain, as the two denizens of our town neared the crest of the bridge. "It was really a fancy slide viewer. Very 3-D. But you could buy these wonderful collections of disk sets like 'World Cities' or 'Big Cats' or 'World's Fair.' I used to spend hours looking at these scenes and dreaming about seeing them for myself some day."

This time it was Marcie's turn not to listen. She stopped abruptly and stood perfectly still, except for her jaw, which slowly gaped open.

For the duo had reached the crest of the bridge's graceful curve, revealing to their view a big chunk of the panorama that is Our Town. Always beautiful, the mountains on either side of Verstovia were expertly highlighted by white snow and dark forest, a drawing done in pencils. There was downtown, then town, then the inner ring of mere "hills" like Gavan, then simultaneously large and distant mountains crowding for every inch of the Soupster and Marcie's view.

The Soupster stepped alongside his friend, pleased by the rapturous look on Marcie's face. "Now, that's 3-D!" he said.
