Our Town July 4, 2013

The Soupster looks at blue skies without rose-colored glasses

The Soupster stared out the airplane window. The scene reminded him of a still life: blue sky suspended above a thick blanket of clouds. Only an occasional shudder of the wing and its subtle tilt away from the horizon hinted at the 36,000 ft altitude and 300 mph speed he was traveling at.

"See anything?" asked the woman next to him, craning her neck for a better view.

The Soupster turned to face her, unsure whether to focus on her penciled eyebrows, glossy lips or hoop earrings large enough to be bracelets.

"Blue sky" he replied, turning back to the view. "Blue – sky," he repeated silently to himself. It had a pleasant ring to it. "Been a while since I said the words 'blue' and 'sky' in the same sentence," he said out loud. The woman raised her eyebrows quizzically. "It's not that there isn't blue sky in Our Town, it's just that it's often on the wrong side of the clouds," he explained.

The woman continued thumbing through her airline magazine. Every other page seemed to show a luxury resort or condominium, edged by beaches and drenched in sunlight.

As the plane dipped, the blue-sky-and-cloud-canopy gave way to snow-capped mountains, which then morphed into dry brown hills. Finally they were circling over a sprawling metropolis: their destination. The grid of buildings and roads, with traffic winding through, reminded the Soupster of a circuit board buzzing with electrical activity.

A few hours earlier the Soupster had been glad to be getting off the rock, but now he realized he was also glad for his return ticket. Closing his eyes, he was back in Our Town, sitting beside the sea, throwing a stick for his neighbor's dog. She would bound over rocks into the water to retrieve the stick, then flop down in sandy seaweed to gnaw on it. A seiner plied the black, glassy surface of the sound, with a backdrop of forested hills rising into the mist. The Soupster sighed. The fresh, salty air was cool on his skin and a breeze rustled his hair.

"Thank you!" boomed the overhead announcement, shaking the Soupster out of his trance; "We appreciate your choosing our airline...have a great day!"

The Soupster smiled. "A good choice indeed," he said, turning to the woman to congratulate them both. A mystified look washed over her face again. The Soupster felt obliged to clarify. "Well, considering there's no other airlines to choose from... I guess we could have taken the ferry… But we'd still be three days away from our destination and probably wandering around looking for the best lounge to unroll our sleeping bag in. Anyway, as they say, the sooner you get there, the sooner you can get back."

The plane landed and the Soupster strolled down the jet way, into the sea of humanity. "Doesn't take long to know which side of the clouds you belong on," he thought, taking a deep breath and making his way forward.

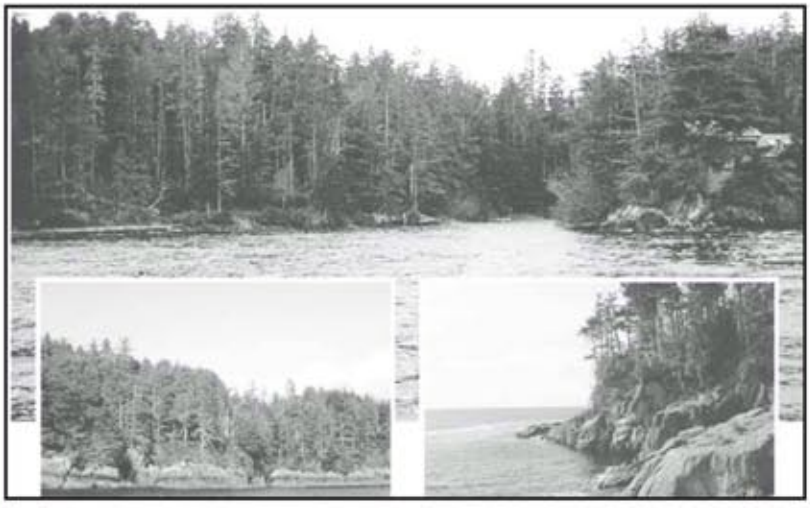
– Sitka, AK, Long Island, Tract M –



Oceanfront property of 6.88 acres (30.000m2) on beautiful Long Island. Located 15 minutes by boat, approx 5 miles south of Sitka, Alaska's former Russian capital. There are approximately 15 lots on this 70 acre island. The roughly triangular shaped lot is facing the sea towards North and South. The north side would typically be the access to the lot, as there is a natural harbour in between Long Island and Mertz Island providing mooring possibilities for all island property owners. The larger south side is marked by three ravines, providing an interesting topography for building purposes. The lot is heavily forested with Hemlocks, Sitka spruces and other trees and brushes. The highest point on the lot, closer to the south shore, is approximately 80 feet above sea level and provides a panoramic view towards the open Pacific.

Alligators and crocodiles are both reptiles and look about the same, but there are some differences • Crocodiles have a more V-shaped snout and often live in salt water • Alligators have a wider snout and live mostly in fresh water • Crocodiles can be found all over the world, but alligators can only be found in the U.S, and China • The largest crocodiles can weigh 2,000 lbs and measure 21-feet in length • They may live up to 80 years!
