The Soupster encounters an old saying in real life

Standing in the line at the bank, the Soupster watched the lone teller, who was taking a few minutes straightening out some thorny issue with Cary Russ. So, to pass the time, the Soupster nudged Spring Ford, who was standing in line, too.

"Hey Spring," he whispered. "High finance, huh?" he pointed his chin at the counter, where the teller and Cary were still murmuring in a huddle. The Soupster could only make out a couple of words -- "identity" and "authorization."

"Complicated negotiations," said the Soupster, who was in an impatient mood. "Hope it's not identity theft."

"Oh, I was on the wrong end of some identity theft a few years back," Spring said. "The credit card company called to ask me if I had made any purchases in Hungary. My card people straightened it all out and it didn't cost me a penny."

"But if they hadn't," she pointed at the counter, "there, but for the Grace of God, go I. Or, would've gone I."

The Soupster peered sadly at Cary, assuming the worst. But Cary, standing straight, didn't look like the victim of anything.

Spring started speaking again. "It's ancient history now, but when I divorced my first husband there were financial complications. All of the money and property was intertwined and it took our Houdini of a bookkeeper to figure it all out."

"A big mess, huh?" the Soupster commiserated.

"But you know, Soupster," she said, "we weren't really mad at each other. Lawrence was a reasonable guy. When I would listen to some of my divorced friends, I heard nightmare after nightmare story about them or their former partners making things impossibly difficult. Things that should have been easy.

"I'd hear their stories and I always thought, `there, but for the Grace of God, go I.'"

As if on cue, a satisfied growl emanated from Cary Russ at the bank counter. He slapped the teller a high five and turned with an ear-to-ear grin.

"It's been transferred – my inheritance," Cary told the Soupster and Spring. "I didn't want to celebrate until the money was in the bank. My Aunt Doris. You're the first people I've told."

"How much did you inherit?" asked Spring."

"Too much!" Cary laughed. "Much too much!" He flew out of the bank, almost literally.

The Soupster looked down at the bank statement in his hand, with its meager sums. He stared wistfully in the direction of Cary's exit.

"There," he told Spring, "but for the Wrath of God, go I."

A LITTLE CAR

People use all kinds of vehicles that move -- cars, trucks, snow machines, tractors, even carts pulled by horses • Drivers are the ones who control where and how the vehicle goes. Everyone who wants to be driver has to take a test first. Special vehicles -- like big trucks -- may require taking a special test • People who drive boats or airplanes are called pilots.
